Manual No. 1
BACKGROUND

There was a lot of talk about color fonts at TypeCon 2013 in Portland. Designers have been making layered digital fonts for a few years. I just wasn’t paying attention. The idea that you can add additional parts to a font to enhance its versatility is very intriguing. Like dresses for a Barbie Doll. It reminds me of the old Chromatic Wood Type from the late 19th century. I became familiar with chromatic wood type in the early 1960s. I was working as a lettering artist at Hallmark Cards in Kansas City at the time Rob Roy Kelly was making a big splash at the Kansas City Art Institute with his work with Wood Type. I got to know Kelly a little, and he let me spend hours in his office with his fabulous library of Wood Type Catalogs. I was drawn to the Chromatics and worked at producing a few chromatic characters as linocuts to print with. But that was a long time ago. Everything was very labor-intensive. There were no computers. It was like Caveman Days. Then, during TypeCon, it was like, “Wow! Chromatics!” I started experimenting with layers as soon as I returned from Portland. I’ve been working on several layered families at once. Sutro Duluxe is a typeface I thought I had finished before I went to Portland, but I was wrong. It needed a shot of energy. First, I did a Fill font to put color into the letterforms. Then I added various other inline and fill fonts. Sutro Deluxe is now a five font family.
Sutro Deluxe was originally designed as a plain, bold outlined slab serif font. The double drop-shadow was its main feature. No layers. No fill. No nothing. After Portland, I was crazy to try some layered fonts. Sutro Deluxe hadn’t been released yet, so it became the subject of a little chromatic experiment. I decided to leave the original font alone, and just add some options for ornamenting the interior of the letters.

The original font is now called the Primary font. A fill font was added to put color inside of the letters. The next three fonts are the Inline font, the Inline Shaded font, and the Inline Fill font. Now they are a little Type Family. The Primary Font is like the Daddy Font. The other four fonts all depend on the Primary Font to tie them together.

The Fill font has a slight bleed so when the Primary Font overprints it, not a sliver of light can come through. The stroke widths of the Inline font and the Inline Shaded font straddle the boundaries of the Fill and Inline Fill fonts. With color, there are lots of possibilities.

Fig. 1 Shows the Primary font with the Fill font sliding in behind. Like so.
Fig. 2 Shows the Fill font behind the Primary font and the Inline font has been added.
Fig. 3 The Inline Fill font has been added and the Inline Shaded font has been substituted for the Inline font.

Eventually, there will be better technology to set layered fonts, but until then, I just set these in Adobe Illustrator. InDesign works fine too. The fonts are kerned so set the kerning to Auto. Don’t use Optical Kerning and be careful with Adjust Tracking.

SUTRO DELUXE

A chromatic font with five layers starting with Sutro Deluxe Primary.

Here is Sutro Deluxe Primary with the Fill font.

...with the Fill font and the Inline font.

...or with the Shaded Inline font.
Primary font over Fill font.
You can use the Fill font with the Inline Fill font,

...then you can add the Inline font.

The Primary, the Fill, the Inline Fill and the Shaded Inline.
I call this The Full Cleveland.

You can even do the drunken letterpress printer thing.
